

The part of Randy Pausch's Last Lecture that affected me most was probably when he said, "The brick walls are there for a reason." He explained that the brick walls are there, "...to give us a chance to show how badly we want something." It turns obstacles into a test of dedication and resolve. It says that desiring something is about finding a way through the walls. The walls are there to filter people that do not want "it" enough. I think setbacks are inevitable and are tests of perseverance.

I also identified with the keeping of a positive attitude. He says it is important to pursue your dreams to also empower others. The "Head Fake" concept was also interesting to me. It is about learning other things indirectly. My favorite part of learning fighting games was learning to learn.
